

ABSTRACT

A method and system for political advocacy is described that uses a nationwide voter registration database, rather than a zip code-to-district matching system, to link advocates to their elected officials. Thus, advocates can contact the appropriate elected officials, and the elected officials can be informed of the advocates' political relevance. Furthermore, a targeted political advocacy technique is described in which a grassroots coordinator can send action alerts to those advocates who are registered to vote in districts of a particular group of legislators.
